Compulsory REVISION comments	The article cannot accomplish the main goal presented in the title. It explores some new trends in the US, UK and French Sociology of Education, especially associated with some criticism regarding quantitative approaches and development of ethnographic and ethnomethodologic research on school life. Actually, the article should acknowledge that the theoretical and methodological approaches were multiple over these decades. Quantitative analysis were developed during these different stages, according to structural-functionalist and Marxism frameworks, but also framed by other theories, as socio-historical, culturalist, methodological individualism, rational choice theory, etc. Also qualitative analysis was based by different theoretical approaches.	Thank you very much for your feedback. However, our aim was to focus on certain schools of thought considered to be the most important, as they incorporate broader considerations and determine the further course of Sociology of Education. Our view is based on their approach through the Greek paradigm of theories interpretation about Sociology of Education.
